I find this plugin very annoying, however. It changes the registry without a confirmation, so it's not really safe. If you are familiar with the Registry Editor, it's pretty much like "Run as administrator", except you can't see what you are actually doing. I've found a way around this problem, though. If you open Windows Task Scheduler, open the Actions box at the top and create a new task. Name it something like SolidworksAdvancedOptions - you can call it whatever you like, but SolidworksAdvancedOptions is a good choice. Then set the Start Now to 1, and the Task to Click to Run. Leave all of the other settings at default, and click on OK. Now you can choose "Run as administrator" and your registry will be edited. After you've saved this task, and then scheduled it to be run, it will open a box with a list of programs. Click on SolidworksAdvancedOptions.exe and then double-click on the task. Now you can add SolidworksAdvancedOptions -L to the batch file. It will add the L before the SolidworksAdvancedOptions - that's the full name of the file. Now Solidworks will know it can find the program even if you just double-click on the file instead of double-clicking on the task. Now I'm not sure if this is a bug in Windows 7 or not. I also don't know if any special permission is needed to execute the plugin, or if it's possible to disable the task without uninstalling it. I haven't figured that out yet. I know you can easily stop it, though. A: Apparently you can edit the registry in Windows 7 without having to use an.exe with Run As Administrator permissions. You open the registry editor and navigate to: HKEY_CURRENT_USER\Software\Autodesk\AutoCAD\SolidWorks Then you will see a key named Software\Autodesk\AutoCAD\SolidWorks\64. I know it's 64 because I see a folder called Plugins64 in the registry. Just add an \ to the end of the path to make it HKEY_CURRENT_USER\Software\Autodesk\AutoCAD\SolidWorks\64\Plugins64. Now, whenever you click on that key in the registry, it will open the plugin without needing to run the SolidworksAdvanced 82157476af
